Market outlook and news tracker

Hong Kong and China market outlook

U.S. stock futures were trading lower on Monday, reversing Friday's mostly upbeat action, though analysts warned against reading too much into the moves, given traders are off for Presidents Day American stock markets and the bond market are closed for the holiday, and there are no economic releases expected, as federal agencies are shuttered.

European indices ended lower across the region, sliding throughout the session amid thin volumes with both China & the U.S markets closed for holidays. Amongst turnover approx. 50% lower than the thirty day average, only the Oil & Gas and Insurance sectors finished in positive territory, with Personal & Household stocks the laggards. Italy's FTSE MIB underperformed peers amid ongoing reports of a feud between the country's coalition parties.

On Chinese front, the A-share market still closed for Lunar New Year holiday but H-share market resume trading in year of the dog for its first trading day. Over the weekend, the US department of commerce release 232 trade measures proposal on steel and aluminium. At such, this week focus may related to basic materials sector and blue-chips stock that are going to release year end result.
